Duty of Confidentiality.

The Central Register of Wills enters into a contract of confidentiality with a testator immediately upon registering that testator's Will or Codicil. The duty of confidentiality that the Central Register of Wills is bound by is under common law, contract law and data protection legislation.

The contents of a registered Will or Codicil cannot be disclosed without the consent of the testator during the testator's lifetime. After the death of the testator the contents of the Will or Codicil on request will be disclosed to the executors when they produce a death certificate. A person other than an executor who produces a death certificate will be able to obtain confirmation of the existence of the Will or Codicil, but not its contents. If there is confirmation that a Will or Codicil exists the person who produced the death certificate will be informed of the name of the executors, but not of the contents of the Will or Codicil.

The Central Register of Wills shall at all times have adequate measures in place to protect against any unauthorised access to the registered information. Once probate is granted the Will or Codicil becomes a public document.
